The main building is two stories high, sixty-six feet front by one hundred and twenty-two in depth, the floor in the first story is made of cement and presents a surface almost as smooth as polished metal and is used for sprouting the grain after it has been taken from the steeping cisterns. The inside of the building is whitewashed, and everything looks as bright and clear as the kitchen of a tidy housekeeper. On the second floor we find the bins for storing grain and the dry kilns, three in number.

During the past year this firm has malted sixty thousand bushels of grain and are still unable to supply the demand. They design at an early day to increase the capacity of their works to one hundred thousand bushels per annum. A considerable portion of their product is sold to Wheeling brewers, but their principal markets are the Eastern cities. The process of malting is a very simple one, but requires great care and considerable experience on the part of the operator.
